

Isaac Asimov on Mensa arrogance:

American Mensa touts its favorite son, Isaac Asimov, one of the world's truly great minds, as being a member.

While Asimov was indeed an early member of Mensa, he soon quit, citing members' "arrogance." He rejoined years later, giving it another shot, but then again quit, again citing arrogance.

Seems the national big-shots, which were then in New York as was he, were always ingratiating themselves with him.

That is the word Asimov so attributed to those he knew in Mensa: "Arrogance."

Is it any surprise?

(Google "Asimov" and "Mensa" and "arrogance" and see what you get.)
